Punctuation World

Karl

Parid (basic punctuation, retention, duration) [period]

The period is the most important symbol in a sentence, usually marking the end of a sentence and playing a decisive role in the sentence. This is the only and only function of the period.
He was the final decision-maker of the Kurati Lexical Institute. He was the same age as Kuratish, at the very beginning of his birth—that is, at the birth of 'sentences'—the ending of the sentence was already predetermined.

Pared was unwilling to interfere with the people's own development; he simply gave approval to allow things to continue. He was already far too old, having understood almost all the exchanges on this continent, both familiar and unfamiliar. He decided not to interfere, letting everything lead to the inevitable outcome that would ultimately lead to it.
But this is not a form of pessimism; rather, it is a kind of acceptance. He does not need to deal with the complex relationships and conflicts between people; he just needs to observe, to wholeheartedly experience the flow of nature. The end of everything is fixed, but everything is different. Although the ending is set, the meaning of a sentence is a sentence that conveys meaning, so feel it.

Bathing in the morning sunlight into his mountain cabin, it was an extraordinary morning, and everything was as usual. The word 'period' itself can be interpreted as a cycle, so it is associated with time, and the similarity between time and a period is the eternal end. As the symbol at the end of a sentence, the period seems to observe everything within the sentence, leaving traces of his observation at the end.

Pared is the creator of Koma (commas), and his original intention was to have Koma assist him in managing the commas he created. Komar has self-awareness, which was only established the moment Koma was born, which made Pared feel that treating Koma as a complete management terminal was cruel. So he decided to teach Komar and help him find his own path.

Comma (basic punctuation, transition, retention) [comma].

Commas are used within sentences to indicate the intervals between groups of information, simplify information at the phonetic level, and facilitate understanding at the reading level. Therefore, in design, the focus is on it as Parade's assistant, responsible for managing all "commas" (commas usually appear frequently), obeying Parade's instructions to explore the world.

Although Pared had actually been through many years, Koma didn't know this. When he first woke up, he was used as a terminal to integrate daily work, responsible for handling countless messages sent back by "commas." It's unclear whether Pared was intentionally guiding him, but even though he greatly enjoyed the process (because it was the meaning of his existence), it seemed there was a broader world worth savoring.

As an information terminal, it naturally possesses all kinds of information, but does this information really make up the individual called the "Koma"? It is made up of countless "commas," and these black ink dots containing worldly information are its neural network. But is it actually calling on information, or is it truly thinking as a person? Perhaps even they themselves are unsure.

Pared told him that one day he would feel as relieved as the "ignorant observer" he sees every day (Pared told Komar why he observes the world, though we know this is not true).
Go seek meaning. Koma still has a long way to go; it still maintains its service nature as a terminal, obeying orders. The comma will eventually lead the sentence to a period, only resting for a few seconds during the journey. Koma's long journey still begins at the beginning of the sentence.

Koreal (basic punctuation, emphasis, condition) [question mark]

Bard, codenamed "The Doubter," is a title inherited from her previous namesake Bard and also her sister (Kelitya, question mark). If the question mark carries a fervent spirit of questioning, then the question mark represents the most fervent spirit of adventure.

Since childhood, when she watched her sister repeatedly question authority and all injustice, in order to protect her sister, she was filled with longing for her from the bottom of her heart.

Kelitia treated her very well, seemingly seeing a soul similar to her own, and began to cultivate her emerging spirit of questioning. Growing up in this way of thinking, she gradually realized that what she truly loved was tracing back to the roots. Her sister's questioning was also an analysis of the origins of rules and existing frameworks, and her scope was much broader.

Her insight into language skills came during a long trip. She loved the world so much that as a young woman, she would never follow a path, because the world shouldn't be constrained. Undoubtedly, this was a reckless move, as she was constantly drawn to all sorts of things.
So she turned again and again, completely losing her way. Until in the end, all she found was a strangely colored leaf. Doubt, doubt, then delusional hope to obtain it. This is the spirit of adventure. Following the leaf home, she understood it. The ability to sense traces and origins was also a continuation of Kelitia's contemplation of the essence of things.

Even now, she was still so recklessly full of energy. The Bard's job was to record—she recorded why unknown and known things were born and pondered them. As long as she wanted to know. Of course, she also helped some people with lost and found things—this ability was just too practical.

Later, she met Ikomush (an exclamation mark) and regarded him as a close friend. In her view, Ikomushe was truly reliable and could help her solve many problems. However, what truly made Ikomushe's relationship with her a friendship that became, or even more so, was through a deep drive within each of them.

Keshi saw things clearly; her abilities were so strong that even though Yike Mush's enthusiasm was mostly about her work, deep down he was still filled with something that made Keshi admire him—emotion. Keshi is especially selfish; in her view, emotions are undoubtedly an "answer," but what exactly is this answer? Perhaps even relying on her abilities would be hard to find.

Ikomush was the first person who at least understood her "self-interest." Question marks are used to make sentences express interrogative elements, and their usage is much broader than counter-question marks. My first reaction to question marks is that of explorers, so extending the question mark is strong, which perfectly fits the design.

The interaction with the exclamation mark originates from two strong punctuation marks, which are functionally very similar, both expressing a strong function, but in terms of function, one has a stronger effect and the other a stronger emotional effect, complementing each other.
Usually, the combination of exclamation and question marks can express amazement. The rhetorical question mark traces the origin at the result level, while the question mark traces the process itself; sisters correspond to each other.

The name Koreal is written vertically in a floral script, very much like "? real", and it's a variation of the first few sounds of 'question', which is quite interesting.

Ikamush (basic punctuation, emphasis, emotion) [exclamation mark]

Exclamation marks are used to emphasize emotion and a strong tone! They are used both in sentences expressing emotion and in sentences that convey command, so there is a duality.
Ikomush is a part of the aitif (adverb, responsible for overseeing other departments of the Kuratish political system) responsible for overseeing the noun (noun).

This design perfectly reflects the use of exclamation marks in imperative and imperative expressions, which are strongly imperative forms, where emotions are usually cold and explosive.

She had a sword, red one. The design of this sword was like a huge red sharpened exclamation mark, responsible for cutting through the emotions mixed in Noon's department records. These emotions, which did not belong to the original information and must be eliminated, which was crucial. These emotions affected the accuracy of the records, and Norn had to fully preserve the original emotions uploaded by the bard in the record compilation, ensuring that none of the records lost their meaning.

This is difficult to achieve, which is also an important reason for Etie's existence. Daytime is working hours; even as an overseer, Ikomush must temporarily cut off her own emotions to ensure the accuracy of her work. She reviews others' emotions, emotions, even the coldness of orders, which is emotion.
Ikomush was not a cold person; on the contrary, her emotional world was very rich, but she had to set aside these "must-discard" things during work. When Norn was recording, she could see all the records but could not align or judge them, even if she liked them or disliked them; this was indeed an important part of Kuratish.

Perhaps it was because she absorbed so many of these emotions that she needed intense emotional release after work. After returning her feelings, she hoped to find someone who could listen to the emotions she observed. She needed it, she had to express her feelings. At work, she was always rational, thinking of Kuratish's interests. Sometimes she would put on her hood to calm herself, so at least she wouldn't think too much about releasing her emotions. But outside of work, she was more relaxed than anyone.

Because of this, she loves drama. The plays performed by Daisy (dash) are her favorite, because she stretches emotions for a long time, allowing the audience to grasp the meaning themselves.
Ikmush was certainly good at this. She had seen too many emotions and naturally became one of Daisy's biggest fans. Given her status, it shouldn't be difficult to get close to Daisy, but Etief's position had to be kept secret to ensure fairness. Aside from her superiors and other Attif, the only person who knew her identity was Keshi.

Keshi's (question mark) ability allowed her to directly observe Ikomush's identity. At first, she was quite cautious, but the bard opposite seemed to enjoy listening to those records, so Keshi became the object of her emotional expression. Naturally, Keshi liked to trace her origins, and the things recorded by the bards were all kinds of unique answers, didn't they?

As a bard, even though Keshi might have read the records of other bards, for some reason, she actually enjoyed listening to explanations relayed by others. Ikomush discovered her as an exploration of the source of emotion, but Keshi and she had long been in a relationship. Of course, Keshi probably hadn't fully realized it was mutual.

When designing the exclamation mark and question mark as a couple, it naturally went smoothly. The two characters, one who need emotional expression and one who needs to understand feelings, complement each other perfectly.
Even though Ikomush had to temporarily set aside his feelings related to reality before working during the day, that didn't mean she wouldn't think about it—she just couldn't express it.
